Preface

Innovation has been studied by economists and cultural historians as a social and political feature of time, a means to move countries forward in the race. Technological advances and the market value of innovative products and services have highlighted the importance of innovation in development. This experimental monograph aims to contribute to the study of innovation from the perspective of the business plan methodology.

The "Innovation and Sustainable Development" Laboratory of the Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú (LID) and the "Innovation Studies" group of the University of Valencia, Spain, are joining forces to develop a long-term research project focused on innovation in a triple helix. The goal is to find analyses from different perspectives and regions. We could suggest that, using many different ways again, we decided to join our re-

Innovations are considered relevant for economic growth, development and competitiveness. Many experts have analyzed their impact on business, society and politics. This book compiles essays written about innovation as the central theme by members of the research group strategic and international studies at Universidad Veracruzana (Mexico). Each academic that participated in this project contributed to the discussion about innovations from their own perspective and discipline. Some of the essays explore the origins of the concept and others discuss the innovation strategies implemented at different levels.
